How to Make the Most of Yourself

A COMMON SENSE WEDDING OUTFIT.-

a couple of lingerie skirts for evening wear or with light sunimer frocks.

As foot covering, one should buy two pairs of walking shoes, the wedding slippers and a pair for general wear. Then there will be a kimine, and, perhaps, a dainty negliges, long or short as preferred. If one can make the undergarments at home without too much labor or infoonvenience, there will be a saving in doing so, but lingerie ready to wear is so well made nowadays and so moderately priced that unless one has lots of time it drant and make it up.

have it made in an extreme style, which, more likely than not, will go out of fashion quickly and thus date the gow.

The conventional wedding dress must never be short. A train, if only a short one, is imperative. Also it must not be low-necked or too short as to sleeve. The neck may be cut out a little and finished with folds of tulle, and the sleeves should reach the elbow, where they are met by gioves. Hone and slippers will be white, and to wear much jewelry is considered bad taste.

If the underwear is to be bought, then the french sort will be the best investment all around. The material is fairly substantial, while the trimming—junt embroidery worked into the goods, the edges of neck and sleeves, buttonhole scalloped—makes the model very easy to launder, and there is no fear of the trimming tearing. It will last as long as the garment. Nightdresses and chemises are marked at $1.50. And now in regard to the bride's outfit, household and personal.

While the bridegroom is expected to buy the furniture, the bride must provide the house linen. This should be marked with the bride's mainten name. In fact, she has no other for the time being, and in the old countries it it considered to be tempting dire fate to mark any belongings with the married name until it is the bride's legitimately. Her trunk, if lottered, should bear the initials of her maiden, not her married, name.

In planning a trousseau the season is of course, taken 1...o consideration when buying the outer clothing, but the personal linen will 'clude the same list' things all the year round.
